Bertie Bird was happily digging worms in the bank of a pond one morning when up waddled a mother duck leading four tiny ducklings. And trailing not far behind was a baby chick.

"Hey, chickie!" called Bertie, amused. "What are you doing here?"

"I'm going fwimming!" stated the chick.

"But you don't know how to swim," said Bertie. "You'll just get drowned!"

"Just watch me," the chick told him. "You'll see!"

So Bertie stood on the bank and watched as the little chick followed the mother duck and ducklings into the water.

Bertie was pop-eyed with amazement. "Well, I'll be a cuckoo's uncle!" he exclaimed. "Guess he can swim after all!"

But as the chick thrashed the water frantically with his tiny wings, Bertie knew that something was wrong. The chick did not seem to be swimming and was floundering dangerously.

"Hang on, chick!" Bertie called, becoming alarmed. "I'll save you!" And darting over, Bertie grabbed the chick by a wing and hauled him onto a nearby lily pad. "There!" he said. "You're safe now."

After shaking himself vigorously, the chick glared at Bertie. "How can I learn to fwim," he said crossly, "if you're going to keep pulling me out of the water?"

"Listen, chick!" said Bertie, trying hard to be patient. "Let's face it. Chickens can't swim. And the pond is a dangerous place for a little fellow like you. Come on! We'll dig worms."

"No!" answered the stubborn chick. "I'm going to fwim."

But before the chick could jump in again, the raucous cry of an eagle startled him. "What's that?" he asked Bertie.

"An eagle!" cried Bertie. "And it's coming this way. Stand still, and I'll hide us." And quickly grabbing the edge of the lily pad in his beak, Bertie pulled it over them.

As he heard the swoosh of the eagle's wings directly above him, Bertie shivered. But when the eagle flew on, he relaxed and let go of the lily pad. "See!" he said. "I told you the pond is dangerous."

"It isn't now," said the chick. "So, why can't I go fwimming?"

"Well, go ahead!" snapped Bertie, feeling pretty cross by this time.

But as the chick moved toward the edge of the lily pad, Bertie cried, "Wait! I've just thought of a wonderful surprise for you. If I can get you off here."

Glancing around, he noticed the ducks. "Mother Duck!" he called. "Will you please give us a ride on your back to the other end of the pond?"

"Gladly!" answered Mother Duck. And she carried them across the pond.

After thanking her, Bertie led the excited chick to a nearby shallow pool in which Bertie had bathed earlier in the day. "Well, here's your surprise," he said. "A fwimming —I mean, a swimming pool just for you."

"Cheep!" cried the little chick, and in the pool he plopped.

Bertie watched him, laughing. "He looks like a chicken," he said. "But he acts like a duck." And still twittering over the mixed-up chick, he returned to his worm digging, which was a lot more fun than swimming, anyway.
